Excerpt from How to Teach Wood Finishing

Order of Topics. The contents are arranged in the order in which they should be studied. We have treated definite problems rather than given general directions without regard to any specific case. This makes possible very brief, specific, yet readily understood directions. These being fully comprehended, their application to a large variety of problems is obvious and easy. The table of contents affords an easy method of learning where each method or style of finishing is treated. A well - arranged index facilitates the finding of any topic desired.

Variety of Finishes. Altho specific problems are considered, and each type of finishing described as it would be applied to a specially suitable article, almost any article mentioned might be finished with any of the finishes given.

Materials. The various finishing materials are discussed in considering the processes in which they are first used.
